

Jordan Ellis

Account Executive

Resume: 76/100 | Interview: 74/100 | Overall: 75/100

Two years of inside sales with developing ownership of the full account cycle.

Discovery and qualification: 78/100 (weight 30%)

Describe a discovery call that changed your sales approach. What did you learn and what did you do?

A prospect wanted a product demonstration. I asked about team size and their current process, then learned their manager was not involved. I added a manager discovery meeting before the demo. It helped us explain the right workflow, although I did not track the eventual operational result.

Pipeline discipline: 68/100 (weight 25%)

How do you manage your pipeline and forecast? Give a concrete example.

I review opportunities each Monday and update dates. I use my judgment about how positive the calls feel. Last month two deals moved to the next quarter after purchasing delays. I had included both in commit. I am starting to require a confirmed decision date but cannot give a forecast-accuracy figure yet.

Objection handling: 76/100 (weight 25%)

Tell me about a price objection and how you handled it without overpromising.

When a customer raised price, I asked what budget they had and reviewed the basic package. My manager approved a smaller scope. I did not promise a discount independently. The customer kept talking with us, but I did not personally own the closing decision.

Client handoff: 72/100 (weight 20%)

How do you hand a newly won account to the delivery team?

I send an email with the contract and contact names to the account team. I try to attend the kickoff. I do not yet use a standard checklist for risks or customer success measures; our account manager fills those in.

Limitations and follow-up

Limited direct ownership evidence; no inference about capability outside the specific examples provided.

Probe forecast criteria and ask for a complete, personally owned close-to-delivery example.

No real interview, recording, perception analysis, or integrity assessment exists. All evidence is an authored fictional transcript.